EDITOR'S DISPATCH

Some journeys start with a date on a calendar. For a lot of us, December is that date: a festival we have meant to see for years, a family gathering that is also an excuse to go somewhere, a winter we want to spend under a different sky.

This first issue of Wayfarer is built around that impulse, but with a rule we intend to keep: a festival is a doorway, not a destination. The drums at Kisama are extraordinary. So are the terraced fields of Khonoma, a kitchen in Kohima, a quiet field of rice stubble in the evening light. We want to take you through the door and out the other side.

LEAD STORY

Ten days of drums: the Hornbill Festival

Every December, Nagaland gathers its tribes in one hillside village. What to see, how to go well, and why the festival is only the beginning.

ALSO IN THIS ISSUE

Beyond Kisama: three Naga villages for the days after
Khonoma, Touphema and Longwa — different corners of Nagaland, and three different ways of understanding it.

The white desert: Kutch in the cool season
A salt flat the size of a small country, a tent city, and the craft villages that give the landscape its human scale.

Sri Lanka in the dry season: coast, tea and train
Why December to March suits the south and west coasts, and how to link them with the hill country without hurrying.

Tromsø: a patient guide to the northern lights
No one can promise the aurora. Here is how to give yourself good odds — and a good trip either way.
